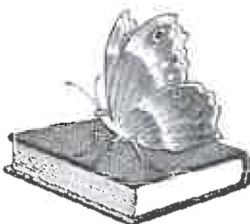
TLS e-paper - TLS - 15 Aug 2014 - Page #26 http://tls.newspaperdirect.com/epaper/services/OnlinePrintHandler....



Women's Studies

Jessica L. Malay
THE CASE OF MISTRESS MARY HAMPSON
Her story of marital abuse and defiance in seventeenth-century England
176pp. Stanford University Press. Paperback. £12.99 (US $19.95).
978 0 8047 9055 0

Such was the legal status of married women in seventeenth-century England that "one of the more bizarre bequests found in wills from the period is that of the husband who leaves a wife her clothes". Officially denied any form of independent legal status or ownership rights, married women were particularly vulnerable to, as the harrowing case of Mary Hampson demonstrates, protracted campaigns of physical, emotional, and financial abuse at the hands of their own husbands. But, as Jessica L. Malay is careful to point out in the introduction to her study of Hampson's case, there were ways that women and their families could seek to mitigate potential problems, often finding ways "to circumvent the restrictions of coverture through marriage settlements, jointures, and other legal agreements" or, when abuse did take place (and if they could afford it), turning to the courts for redress. While these efforts were not always successful, they highlight the complex interplay of social and legal forces that meant a woman's complete financial and legal subservience within marriage was not always a given.

The centrepiece of Malay's study is an edition of Mary Hampson's unusual pamphlet, printed in London in 1684, in which she provides a first-person account of "the contrivances of Mr. Hampson, which hath brought me now under so great oppression". She provides an account of a marriage which apparently began happily enough but which, at the onset of financial troubles, descended into mutual hostility, with Mary, the most vulnerable party, frequently being found starving, beaten, or homeless. The pamphlet, a socially risky publication, apparently motivated by "financial need" and Mary's "deep sense of injustice", provides a chilling insight into the helpless position in which a seventeenth-century woman in an abusive marriage could find herself. But things are not always as straightforward as they seem, and Malay follows up her edition with a meticulous examination of further evidence relating to the events of the marriage, ranging from court records to tombstones. In some cases, these materials suggest Hampson underplays the horror of particular situations while others indicate that she occasionally obscures her own violent and obstructive behaviour. In doing so, they show us how the scales were disastrously loaded against Hampson, as well as her adept self-fashioning and ability to slip in and out of the various legal and textual discourses available to her. This is a remarkably detailed and engaging study that bears witness to the authority that seventeenth-century women could find in the written word.

ALICE EARDLEY

"Cupid with Two Dogs" by Paolo Veronese, 1580–85; taken from Paolo Veronese by Alessandra Zamperini (352pp. Thames and Hudson. £60. 978 0 500 093832)

Cultural Studies

Geoff Dyer
ANOTHER GREAT DAY AT SEA
Life aboard the USS 'George H. W. Bush'
162pp. Visual Editions. Paperback. £25.
978 0 9565 6926 4

"Say, when does this place reach New York?" quipped a passenger travelling aboard the Queen Mary in 1936. Geoff Dyer, a romancer of the high seas and the American dream, describes the place in which he lived for two weeks, an aircraft carrier called the USS George H. W. Bush, as "an aquatic version of the Mid-west and the Bible Belt South". The crew of 2,000, most of whom "git the high", as the ship's drugs counsellor calls it, from Jesus Christ, drift off at 10 pm every night to a prayer coming down the tannoy system. Take away the noise of planes launching and returning on the carrier, and life on board is as silent as a medieval monastery. Every day is a test of manhood (especially for the women) and inner mettle: there are rules against coupling, alcohol and Gmail; there is barely any leisure time and no such thing as privacy.

Taller, greyer and skinnier than everyone else, Dyer is here for two weeks as writer-in-residence. His job is to be inconspicuous, to note and to observe. He has with him the photographer Chris Steele-Perkins to capture the monotony of the landscape and the weirdness of the interior, which is as dark, vast and tubular as the belly of a whale. The result is less like a sea story (Dyer never sees the sea) than a voyage into outer space. The USS George H. W. Bush could be the clunking airship of Ridley Scott's Alien, with its sweating workers, its androgynous females, and its total disengagement from Planet Earth.

"I was not the first writer ever to have set foot on an aircraft carrier", Dyer says wistfully. It is not until he returns to land that he comes across Tom Wolfe's essay, from 1975, about pilots flying missions from a carrier during the Vietnam war, "The Truest Sport: Jousting with Sam and Charlie". Everything noted by Dyer has been noted before by Wolfe. Dyer loses his swagger as a "steady oh shit sensation" hits him. But the wrestle with Wolfe adds to his own writing, giving it a second dimension. Dyer goes into a meltdown: Wolfe is more macho, more of a journalist, he has taken a "shark-sized bite" out of Geoff Dyer's confidence. Conrad would have understood. "Trust a boat on high seas", Marlow says in Lord Jim, "to bring out the irrational that lurks at the bottom of every thought, sentiment, sensation, emotion."

FRANCES WILSON

Kristina Pérez
THE MYTH OF MORGAN LA FEY
280pp. Palgrave Macmillan. £57.50.
978 1 137 34025 2

"I was most curious to see her; as curious as I could have been to see Satan", recounts Mark Twain's hero in A Connecticut Yankee in King Arthur's Court, anticipating his initial meeting with the notorious Morgan la Fey. From her first appearance as a healer in Geoffrey of Monmouth's twelfth-century Vita Merlini to her dastardly turn as commander of alien invaders in DC Comics' Camelot 3000, Morgan has had an ambiguous and often sinister reputation. Kristina Pérez's playful and wide-ranging study charts the evolving role of King Arthur's sister from her Celtic roots to the present day, presenting her as "an uncontrollable, powerful female figure . . . who . . . holds the entire Arthurian tradition together".

Three-quarters of Pérez's book traces the development of Morgan in the Middle Ages, from Irish sovereignty legends to versions of the character in Breton lais, Sir Gawain and the Green Knight, Malory's Morte Darthur and other romances. Discussing her in terms of Kleinian psychoanalytic theory, Pérez argues convincingly that Morgan's role in the internal development of various male protagonists reflects larger Western cultural myths about the relationship between quester-heroes and the mysterious otherworld women who function both as lovers and mother figures.

The final chapters address Morgan's portrayal, from the Pre-Raphaelites to the twenty-first century, in literature, the visual arts, film and popular culture. The author is good on the ways in which changing depictions of Morgan have reflected contemporary anxieties about women's social roles, and her account gains a particularly lively pace in its incorporation of Monty Python, Margaret Thatcher and even Camelot-themed Barbie dolls. Pérez's psychoanalytical approach ties her study together effectively, although she is at her most engaging when dealing more directly with the Morgan narratives. Her broad chronological scope makes possible many illuminating connections between medieval and modern Morgans, offering a fresh appreciation of her ambivalent, but always central, role in the Arthurian legend.

ELIZABETH DEARNLEY

Literary Criticism

Christina Morin and Niall Gillespie, editors
IRISH GOTHICS
Genres, forms, modes, and traditions, 1760–1890
232pp. Palgrave Macmillan. £55.
978 1 137 36664 1

"Torture", the future Poet Laureate Robert Southey wrote in July 1798, "has been to all intents introduced in that country." Southey was referring to the British government's brutal crushing of the United Irishmen rebellion, the culmination of a long period of such nightmarish repression that the Irish reality could increasingly be represented only in the forms and themes of the Gothic. As Niall Gillespie observes in his study of Irish Jacobin Gothic, his contribution to Irish Gothics: Genres, forms, modes, and traditions, 1760–1890, writers "mobilized the gothic to portray authentically an authentic reality". Indeed, this fine collection of essays, brought together by Gillespie and Christina Morin, suggests that few genres have generated as much debate in Irish literary studies in recent years as the Gothic. Is there a tradition of Irish Gothic writing? If so, what might it look like and who qualifies as belonging to it?

In the 1980s and 90s, scholars including Roy Foster asserted the existence of a Gothic tradition that consisted of writers such as Charles Maturin, Sheridan Le Fanu, Oscar Wilde, Bram Stoker and W. B. Yeats. Critics have subsequently attacked this seemingly ready-made canon, challenging its narrow ambit. As compelling as the links are between the anxious Anglo-Irish Protestant imagination and the tortuous tropes of the Gothic, the genre is now recognized as so pervasive in Irish writing as to be virtually uncontainable, defying the usual hermeneutic categories. Hence the caution around taxonomy and terminology apparent even in the title of Morin's and Gillespie's collection; the editors' introduction provides a summary of these debates even as the substance of the book moves the conversation on.

While the essays by Elizabeth Tilley, W. J. McCormack, Jarlath Killeen and Luke Gibbons shed new light on lesser-known works by

1 of 1 15/08/2014 10:53

TLS e-paper - TLS - 15 Aug 2014 - Page #27 http://tls.newspaperdirect.com/epaper/services/OnlinePrintHandler....

Le Fanu and Stoker, the emphasis elsewhere is on a widening of scope. Morin's opening essay remaps the genre's origins, while Richard Haslam recuperates the Faustian narratives of an overlooked band of writers in the 1820s and 30s. Diane Long Hoeveler uncovers the ideological agendas underlying Dublin publishers' production of Gothic chapbooks in the early 1800s, and Anne Markey reveals the intersection of Irish folklore and Gothic fiction in the neglected volume Tales of the Emerald Isle; or, Legends of Ireland (New York, 1828), written by an intriguingly shadowy figure, "A Lady of Boston". The essays of Gillespie and Jim Shanahan focus attention on the crucial period from revolution to Union and beyond, giving sober grounding to the oft-made observation that the Irish Gothic proliferated in direct relation to the horrors of history. The experience of colonization, with its repetitions of rebellion and repression, ensures that the Gothic, as Shanahan puts it, "lies at the very core of Irish literature in English".

SINÉAD STURGEON

Bibliography

Malcolm Walsby and Natasha Constantinidou, editors
DOCUMENTING THE EARLY MODERN BOOK WORLD
Inventories and catalogues in manuscript and print
432pp. Brill. €154 (£131).
978 90 04 25889 1

This teeming exploration of early modern book inventories is both precise and expansive: in reading it we track forensically between individual records (a Ventian bookseller's receipts from June 4, 1484, for example), but then lift our gaze to Poland, Norway, Germany and Spain. In chapters enlivened by their authors' infectious delight, we encounter probate inventories, book trade lists advertising or monitoring stock, sales catalogues, banned book lists, and autobibliographies – inventories of works written by the compiler of the list, and a form of bibliography as self-representation favoured by Conrad Gesner and Erasmus of Rotterdam.

Inventories are valuable for reconstructing lost or scattered libraries; for understanding ownership patterns and reading habits; and for revealing retail pricing and second-hand values. Sometimes inventories blossom into much more: Justyna Kiliańczyk-Zięba, in her chapter on the Cracow bookbinder Maciej Przywilcki, reads his inventory to find not only the books in his shop (poetry by Jan Kochanowski; translations of Castiglione's Il libro del cortegiano: guides to choosing a good wife), but also the tools in his bindery and the bindings of his stock. We almost feel what book historians want to feel: that we're there at the book stall in January 1587, turning the pages.

Alexander Marr examines the Bodleian's Benefactors Register: "every man bethinks himself", wrote Dudley Carleton, "how by some good book or other he may be written in the scroll of the benefactors". Kasper van Ommen discusses catalogues of the collection of Josephus Justus Scaliger (a "sixteenth-century Einstein", in Anthony Grafton's words), who on his death in 1609 left the recently founded University of Leiden "tous mes livres de langues estrangeres, Hebraics, Syriens, Arabics, Aethiopiens". Cristina Dondi and Neil Harris describe the fifteenth-century Zornale or day-book of the bookseller Francesco de Madiis, which offers "a fly-on-the-wall documentary of . . . a Renaissance Venetian bookshop".

If lists attempt to impose order on what Robert Burton described as the "vast Chaos and confusion of bookes", then they are often driven by fear: chapters explore inventories generated by the Congregation of the Index in Rome, which paradoxically publicized the titles they sought to eradicate. Lists itemize books and seem therefore to pin them down; but the book culture they describe was mobile: "books easily crossed national and linguistic boundaries". The inventory might be thought of as a record of a temporary alignment of books which each had their own trajectories: a momentary coming together.

The astonishing price of this book will mean, sadly, that Documenting the Early Modern Book World will only find a place in university libraries, or in inventories of texts to be read.

ADAM SMYTH

Philosophy

Michael Edwards
TIME AND THE SCIENCE OF THE SOUL IN EARLY MODERN PHILOSOPHY
236pp. Brill. €99 (£85).
978 90 04 23232 7

"You suppose that the nature of time is perfectly clear, when nothing could be more obscure." This was Pierre Gassendi's reproach to René Descartes in 1644. Time's murkiness is so obvious to Gassendi that he then mocks Descartes outright: "How you would place the whole republic of letters in your debt if you could elucidate the nature of time!" Gassendi later took up the question of time in his posthumously published Syntagma Philosophicum (1658). Like Descartes, he failed to resolve it. Yet the Syntagma's nine folio pages on time demonstrably influenced Isaac Newton's definition of "absolute, true and mathematical time" in the Principia Mathematica (1687).

In his new book, Michael Edwards begins to sketch a parallel history of what Newton would call "relative, apparent and vulgar time". According to Edwards, the Principia "took the soul out of time": his aim is to reconsider the soul's place in theories of time in the decades leading up to Newton's work (roughly, from 1590 to 1660). His book is an original, subtle and approachable contribution to the history of the philosophy of time.

What Edwards calls "the science of the soul" (scientia de anima) is rooted in late medieval and Renaissance commentaries on Aristotle, and associated with Reformation-era scholasticism. Jesuit and Calvinist scholastics occupy the foreground in Edwards's survey. The first half of the book is a finely drawn account of how a network of authors, including Bartholomaeus Keckermann and Hieronymus Dandinus, describe the soul's conjugation of change and duration. Early modern scholastics revised and occasionally devised complex, branching and still interesting distinctions between real and imaginary time, external and internal time, physical and hyperphysical time, divisible and indivisible time, and Edwards reports their discussions with sympathy and skill.

He somewhat marginalizes these scholastics in the book's second part, where he turns to Descartes and Thomas Hobbes as representatives of the "new philosophers". Unlike Keckermann and Dandinus, it is doubtful that Descartes wrote anything lasting about time. It would have been better to devote a chapter to Descartes's combative interlocutor, Gassendi. In the last pages of Edwards's book, it is perplexing that Epicurus and Lucretius receive no mention. Hobbes's theory of time is fundamentally Epicurean (if nominally Aristotelian), and he is perhaps the first philosopher after St Augustine to espouse the Epicureans' sensualist notion of time. Still, as Hobbes said in 1642: "Time has always been whatever anyone wanted it to be".

DAVID VAN DUSEN

Fiction

Ondjaki
GRANMA NINETEEN AND THE SOVIET'S SECRET
Translated by Stephen Henighan
172pp. Biblioasis. Paperback. $15.95.
978 1 927428 65 8

In 1982, engineers from the Soviet Union began building a mausoleum in the Angolan capital, Luanda, for the embalmed body of the country's first president, Agostinho Neto, who had died in Moscow three years earlier. To make way for the rocket-like construction, a residential neighbourhood was demolished; it then took another three decades to complete and cost well over $1 billion. A former Soviet diplomat has described the project as "blatantly absurd" – a quality that has inspired the imaginations of several Angolan artists and writers, among them the author Ondjaki.

Set in the 1980s, Granma Nineteen and the Soviet's Secret (translated by Stephen Henighan) opens with an explosion at the entrance to the mausoleum. Immediately, we are thrust into the world of the child protagonist, Ondjaki's inventive and possibly unreliable narrator who lives with his grandmother and her sister at the foot of the monument. The boy thinks he recognizes the "warlike rumbling" of fighter jets, but is rapidly seduced by the beauty of the flares, "as though all the rainbows in the world had come running to drink a toast on the ceiling of our dark city".

As with Ondjaki's other novels – including Bom dia camaradas (2001; Good Morning Comrades) and Os Transparentes (2012) – this is a strangely deceptive read. Although the narrative often feels rather whimsical, Angola's long history of colonialism and conflict, its various foreign allies and enemies, and the extraordinary suffering of its population, are menacingly present. The narrator's great-aunt only wears black and talks endlessly of the dead and dying. The local tramp, "comrade lunatic" Sea Foam, who hangs out on the beach and makes the children giggle, says of the ocean's salty waters, "They're the tears of those who just died". And the narrator's best friend, Pinduca, observes, "Well, they're always talkin' about peace, but as far as I know it still doesn't exist".

In many ways, the novel (which was first published in Portuguese in 2008) can be read as a brave and highly political work. The text is laced with sarcastic references to the propaganda of the Popular Movement for the Liberation of Angola, which has been in power since 1975, as well as the authority of "Comrade President" and the reliability (or otherwise) of the party mouthpiece, Jornal de Angola. The central plot, which pivots on a community that fears it is about to be destroyed, highlights a contemporary problem in Luanda, where poor neighbourhoods are regularly flattened to make way for the wealthy. Ondjaki deserves praise for taking on such tricky material, even if the final form of this enjoyable novel does not quite match its ambitions.

LARA PAWSON

Memoirs

Lilian Pizzichini
MUSIC NIGHT AT THE APOLLO
A memoir of drifting
224pp. Bloomsbury. £16.99.
978 1 4088 1599 1

In the autumn of 2007, Lilian Pizzichini took herself to live on the Grand Union Canal in Southall. She bought a leaking houseboat and – as the story here goes – gave herself over to drinking and drugs. "The conventional world is one of pretence, formalities and going through the motions", she advises. "In a very real sense, it's a waste of time." Cut then to her new local, the Brickmaker's Arms, where a fairly conventional bunch of the dispossessed "had stopped caring about themselves". Prostitutes, drug-dealers, criminals, pimps and assorted no-hopers hang out in squalor together. She spends a lot of time vomiting in the Ladies, and seems not to mind: "I did not want to take myself seriously because that might involve some effort".

Off the page of this puzzling book though, Pizzichini is somewhere industrious. Her The Blue Hour: A portrait of Jean Rhys was published in 2009. Nothing so dull as a library is mentioned in her calamitous recollections, but a well-researched family tree is in the making throughout, and it is to this that the book's wildest passages drift. Her "genealogical road map" is the starting point for imaginary recollections of distant relations, who wander through fictional scenes of convivial cheer. These fond ancestors sing, suffer, read poetry and cleave to each other through mishap and adventure. Their narratives cut into hers, in hallucinatory fashion. On a trip to score from an ex-con on the South Coast, Pizzichini's drug-induced nightmare is interrupted by scenes from a great-aunt's imagined past: "On the bowling green and open spaces of Southend-on-Sea, Daisy performed cart-wheels, while Herbert recited nursery rhymes".

What seems to be at play here is something much sadder than Pizzichini can tell us directly, which is the longing for company that cares. Swarming relations ("George and Emily Maria reckoned their daughter's darkness was due to the Baldocks on his mother's side") and fragmented historical research ("The Metropolitan Music Hall is now Paddington Green Police Station") seem necessary to compensate Pizzichini for the emptiness of her own affairs. Nothing connects with anything much, least of all the jangled voices, which lurch from one register to another at the drop of something nasty. Jean Rhys is definitely in the mix: "There is nothing so comfortable as being numb". So is melodramatic Victorian fiction: "That man waxes rich on the likes of us". Who Lilian Pizzichini herself is remains a matter for speculation, as "a memoir of drifting" is here eclipsed by the baffling performance of a woman adrift.

SHEENA JOUGHIN

1 of 1 15/08/2014 10:53